At Nutt station merchandise of every kind was being transferred to wagons to be taken to Kingston, and the road was lined with wagons going and coming between these points. The driver of the stage told me that one curious assenger had the day previous counted 79 freight wagons on the road. The stage and numerous backs and spring wagons were loaded with passengers going in to Kingston, and I observed that the same conveyances were coming out empty or with few passengers These things indicated that there must be something to attract people to Kingston, and all of us had made up our minds to find a booming camp On reaching here in the evening we came first upon a lot of tents, brush wigwams and teamster outfits with their camp fires among the trees and brush. This, the driver informed us, was the suburban portion of the city. Then we came among larger and more pretentious tents, some of them with
